

Please use the following organizer to self and peer evaluate your Lesson Plans.

Content Standard	RL.9-10.2 Analyze literary text development. a. Determine a theme of a text and analyze in detail its development over the course of the text, including how it emerges and is shaped and refined by specific details. b. Provide an objective summary of the text that includes the theme and relevant story elements. This lesson is setting the groundwork for the rest of the unit, by giving students concrete elements that they will usually see in the genre we're focusing on (magic tales).
Objective Consider: Bloom's verbs (level of order of thinking) Consider: By statement (how students will practice the skill)	Students will identify and categorize common folk tale elements by completing a graphic organizer, focusing on the Swan Maiden text.
Assessment	Does your assessment have specific criteria that is addressed in the objective? Do you practice the criteria/skill in the lesson? The assessment for this lesson will be written on an index card as an exit ticket. Students will answer the following question: "What are some common elements of folk tales?" They'll be expected to name and summarize 2, describing the elements in their own words. If we don't get to this exit (big day), then I'll collect the students' organizer and look through that to see if anyone needs a bit more scaffolding.
Opening	How are you hooking the students? Are they using prior knowledge? Does your Entrance Ticket PREVIEW OR REVIEW? Do students feel success at the start of class? The opening will be a quick discussion amongst themselves in groups about their favorite fairy tales. This should hopefully activate some schema and give me some time to do administrative tasks like attendance. After about 5 minutes, we'll settle down for a class discussion. I'll ask students what their favorite fairy tale is, and what they think makes that story a fairy tale. I also would clarify that for the rest of the unit, we're going to refer to fairy tales as folk tales, specifically in the magic tales genre. This is mainly my pedantry, but I'd also prefer the students gain some insight into more academic terminology and show them why these distinctions exist.

Instruction What are the skills? What are the strategies to help with the skills? HOW are you teaching the skill?	Are you using gradual release (I Do, We Do, You Do?) How are students practicing the skill prior to the assessment? What is your criteria for success? That is, how are you making the skill criteria and strategy explicit to students? The first part of instruction will be note taking using an organizer that I've created and a slide show that I'll be using. (For the purposes of the in-class teaching, I'm just going to do a few examples.) This portion is fairly straight forward and more like a lecture in format, because we need to cover a decent amount of information and the students will be practicing the material taught for the rest of the week. It starts with an explanation of what a "folk tale" is in a little bit of depth. Then, I'll go over elements that magic folk tales tend to use for the following categories: Character, plot, setting, theme, and style. I need to make sure that I'm prompting questions throughout, though I think this section needs to be gone through in ~15 minutes. After the presentation, we begin the main assignment for this lesson. I'll hand out the text, which is a version of The Swan Maiden from the German tradition. We'll take some time to read the opening together. Then comes the Gradual Release as I demonstrate what we're doing. I Do: After reading the opening, I tell the students that we're looking for examples of the elements that we've been talking about all class in this text. I'll pick one out as a demonstration, from the very first line: the story is set in a non specific forest, which is very common for the genre. I explain my reasoning using the elements already provided.

	We Do: Then, I'll prompt the students to come up with another example from the first paragraph. I'll have them think and pair for ~2 minutes, then we'll share one or two. You Do: If it seems like the students are getting what I'm laying down, I'll release them towards trying it on their own. Criteria: They have setting (I've chosen setting as the example because it's the least interesting for this text) and possibly one other. Their task is to find 3 more for the other categories, one each. By the time they're done, they should have 5 examples, 1 for each category. They'll also have to finish reading the text, so I think working individually is best for this assignment.
Worksheet / Handout / Materials	We have a notes organizer which also sort of doubles as a worksheet. We'll also have the slides for the lecture bit of class.
Closure	How are you providing closure to the lesson? Is there an Exit Ticket? Is it the "You Do"? How do students know they have met the objective? After the opening and lecture section of class, we have about 25 minutes of class left. The goal is that we get through the last section of the instruction, the gradual release bit, in 20 minutes. If that happens, the students will get an index card for the exit ticket: Students will answer the following question: "What are some common elements of folk tales?" They'll be expected to name and summarize 2, describing the elements in their own words. If that doesn't happen, which is probably likely, I'll spend the last few minutes of class walking around and seeing students' work. Then I'll collect their notes at the door instead of the exit ticket. I don't think it's as good of an assessment, but it works and will give me data for next class.
Alignment	Is there alignment between the standard, objective, assessment, and instruction? What is the common thread? In all honestly the standard is a bit of a reach, but the point of this day is to set up the rest of the week by directly giving the elements of a magic tale to the students. The common thread is that we're focusing on magic folk tales as a genre and describing all the elements within.

Text

The Three Swans (shortened).

Germany

Once upon a time there was a hunter. He was very despondent because his wife had died. He often wandered about in the forest entirely alone, thinking about whether or not he would ever find a second wife whom he could love as much as he had the first one.

One day he wandered ever deeper into the woods, with his gun at his side and not knowing where he wanted to go. At last he came to a straw hut. Stepping inside, he found there an old man with a crucifix lying before him. He greeted the man, who received him in a friendly manner and asked him what had led him to this forest hut.

The hunter told him of his sorrows: that he had lost his wife, that he now lived by himself, and that he did not know if he would ever be happy again.

The old man said to him, "There is help. Three swans will come here soon. Look at them carefully! After they have flown to the pond, you must secretly go there without letting them see you. Take one of their dresses and immediately return here with it."

As soon as the old man had spoken, three snow-white swans flew toward the hut. After the hunter saw them, they flew further to a nearby pond.

The hunter crept up and secretly took a dress that one of the swans had taken off and laid on the bank. Then he returned with it to the old man's hut.

When the swans wanted to get dressed again, one of them had only a shift. As a beautiful maiden she came to the hunter, who had her dress, and moved into his house, and became his dear wife.

Before the hunter left the old man, the latter said to him, "You must carefully hide the swan-dress from your wife so that she cannot find it again."

The hunter did this, and he lived with his second wife for fifteen years. She bore him several children, and the married couple were very happy together.

Then it happened that one morning the man left, saying to his wife, "I shall be back at noon to eat."

After he had left, the woman watched him until he disappeared into the woods. Then she went to the attic, which the man had not locked this time, opened the chest containing the swan-dress, put it on, and as a swan flew far, far away.

When the man came home to eat, his wife had disappeared. Not even the children could say where she was, for they had not seen her.
